
Eportfolio Prompt S21

1. Required Elements:

- Reflective Introduction (1500 words minimum, multimodal)
- Week 1 Self-Assessment
- Curated portions of your work in the course (some of which will be hyperlinked in the Reflective Introduction). This work should include sections from various draft stages, reading responses, your Annotated Bibliography, and [instructor will include other assignments from course]

While the required elements will give a basic shape to your eportfolio, the specific details of its organization are yours to construct. Think of your portfolio as a growing archive of evidence—things like drafts, instructor or peer comments, organizational notes, before and after versions of sentences and paragraphs, writing reflections, final versions of your compositions. Use them to document the work you have done, demonstrate your role in your learning, and articulate your intellectual strategies as they pertain to college level rhetoric, composition, and communication.

Be creative and attentive when making choices about organizing the sections and pages in your portfolio. For example, are the compositions going to serve as major organizational elements by following the four prompts below in sequential order? Or are you going to place the compositions and other examples of your best writing together in one “Showcase Writing Section” and organize the other elements of your portfolio in a different manner, along thematic lines, (“Revision Strategies,” “Productive Mistakes”), or in terms of notable developments in your writing (“My Breakthroughs”)?

1b. Supporting Materials

All of the “process” work you do for 39C will generate artifacts for your eportfolio. You can keep them in a separate folder or put them into your portfolio as you go along, knowing that you will continue to organize and reorganize it over the course of the quarter. Either way, you want to carefully make your selections and keep detailed notes and/or write detailed captions for artifacts so that whoever views your eport understands your reasons for choosing a specific piece of evidence.

Possible Artifacts:

- Sentences or paragraphs of your best writing
- “Before-and-After” examples of writing you revised
- Source evaluations and annotations
- Presentation Materials
- Examples of your writing from other classes in comparison to the writing for your WR 39C course
- Instructor & Peer feedback
- Feedback you gave as a peer
- Screenshots or handwritten notes/diagrams of your research and note-taking strategies
- Can you think of anything else? A pic of yourself? Music that inspired you? A screenshot of a salient text exchange? Funny email exchanges? A screenshot of a helpful chat with a librarian or tutor? An image of the terrifying number of tabs you had open on any given day? Work to connect your reader to the whole of your learning in the course.

1b. Reflective Introduction (RI)

The RI is a narrative essay that continues your practice as a college-level writer, thinker, and communicator in a community of your peers. Its fundamental purpose is to illustrate and assess the role you have played in your learning over the course of the quarter in 39C. Like your other compositions for this course, the RI is multimodal and uses carefully selected pieces of evidence to create analytically incisive and compelling claims. The RI should also use cross-referencing strategies, such as hyperlinking, to direct the reader to other sections of the portfolio and other pieces of evidence and their captions.

The Reflective Introduction should address your learning in the following four areas. While you should take each category into account, you may develop some sections more than others. Choose whatever helps you best communicate your learning process.

1. Transferring What You Know: Guiding Prompts

Note: Select only those you find useful and/or add your own

Writing in an academic context: Now that you are at the end of 39C (and the Lower Division Writing Requirement), take a look back to where you were at the beginning of the quarter, or even at the beginning of your college-writing experience, and analyze how your practices and habits of researching, writing, and organizing have changed and evolved. You might consult your Week 1 Self-Assessment to get you started. How have your experiences in writing classes at UCI influenced your personal history as a writer in academic contexts? Has the WR39 series of courses and 39C in particular influenced your ability to make effective choices about how to approach writing assignments in other classes? Assignments such as lab reports, business memos, blue book exams, short response papers, and any other examples of writing you have been assigned in here at UCI? In other words, have you applied what you learned in the WR 39 series to writing assignments in other classes? Have other classes and assignments influenced your writing process; if so, which ones? Please explain using specific examples.

Writing in a course about [your course theme]: How did this course's theme shape your sense of your writing and research in the course? Has this course's theme invited you to think differently about your role as a student, a citizen, or any other community you are a part of?

2. Your Composing Process: Guiding Prompts

Note: Select only those you find useful and/or add your own

How have your strategies for starting an essay evolved over time? How does research figure into this process for you now? How do you see yourself as a writer capable of engaging with other perspectives in the process of composing your essay? How do you go about integrating various kinds of sources into your work? How have you become more skillful and able to control your presentation of evidence and integrate various pieces of evidence into a coherent and meaningful thesis?

3. Rhetoric, Argumentation, & Multimodal Communication: Guiding Prompts

Note: Select only those you find useful and/or add your own

What did persuasive writing mean to you when you started this course? How have you learned to write more persuasively? How have you learned to make more convincing claims? In what ways, specifically, did you formulate and reformulate research strategies, framing questions, and guiding claims by using research? How and why did you use various arguments and counter-arguments and numerous and different sources to strengthen your claims? What role did multimodal communication play in your efforts to create persuasive and convincing compositions?

4. Revision & Writing Community: Guiding Prompts

Note: Select only those you find useful and/or add your own

Describe your revision process. Explain and analyze the types of revisions that you tend to make. Do you revise for better organization, moving paragraphs around, deleting, adding? Narrative Style? Sentence style? How have you evolved in this area? Do you tend to revise for missing evidence? Do you (still?) see this process as a solitary activity or one that involves collaboration, giving and receiving feedback, sharing ideas? Explain how you benefited from feedback from your teacher and from your peers in workshops, presentations, and/or conferences. How do you respond to criticism? What attitude do you adopt when you give it? How did your relationship to peer reviewing evolve? Use examples of feedback you received on your work-in-progress, your final versions, and in workshops, as well as advice you gave to your peers.

2. Learning from Samples

Your instructor will select and present various eportfolio samples for you to use as a frame of reference.

3. Portfolio Grade and Grading Method (20% of Final Course Grade).
